

“For a second time in the history of The Readers’ Subscription the Editors abstain from commenting on a book they offer to the membership. . . . In this second instance of abstention, the Editors explain their silence only by reference to the magnitude of the work, not by any deficiency of personal sympathy with it. . . . This time it was no lack of a sense of affinity that made all three editors refuse the challenge of a book they had selected; only the time was lacking. And perhaps the courage, the book being what it is.” W. H. Auden, Jacques Barzun, and Lionel Trilling, The Griffin, October 1958
